Q: Optimal way to open links in new tabs/windows I am currently writing a Rails application with HAML. One of my views (/_form.haml) has a link_to, and in the action of that link, I need to open the link in a new window/tab. I would like to know what is the optimal way of doing this in Rails. Currently I open them with window.open, as follows: = link_to :action => "index", :controller => "directories" and = link_to :action => "create", :controller => "directories" The issue is I have found no way to get the new window/tab. I have tried inserting the target attribute to no avail. Is there a way to do this? A: If you look at the source of link_to, you will see that the second argument is a block, and it is the last parameter that you are calling. In order to have the call to window.open occur in the current page's context, you need to call that block after window.open: = link_to "new tab", :action => "index", :controller => "directories")) However, that will also open the link in the new tab if you are on a new page, so you probably want to make that conditional. If you only want that functionality in a certain scenario, you can add that logic into your layout or view, or in your application controller. EDIT: You can also probably do it with javascript.
